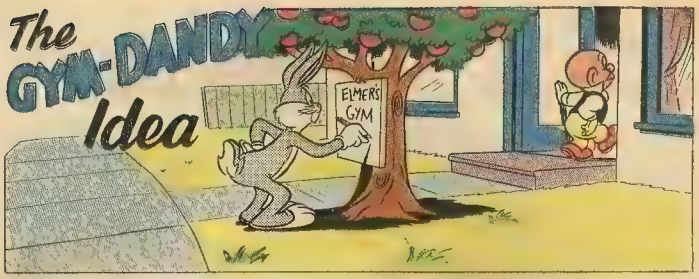
The GYM-DANDY Idea



Bugs Bunny was hurrying down the street one day when suddenly he skidded to a stop in front of Elmer Fudd's house. There, pinned to a big apple tree, was a sign that read ELMER'S GYM 5¢. "Oh, no," Bugs hooted. "Old Doc's flipped at last!"

"Is that so?" Elmer cried indignantly from his front porch. "Why, you muscle-bound wabbit, a little exercise would welax your bwain! I'm going to make a fortune, that's all!"

Bugs perked up his ears. "A fortune, eh? How many suckers . . . er . . . customers have you had so far?"

Elmer's face fell. "As a matter of fact," he confided, "business is wotten. I've been wacking my bwain twying to think of a way to wound up customers." He walked down the steps and patted the big apple tree. "At least my fruit twees are nice this year. How do you like those apples?"

"I'd rather have some cabbage," Bugs grinned, rubbing his thumb against the fingers of one hand. "Say, Doc, if I rustle up some business, will you split the profits with me?"

Elmer shrugged. "Why not?" he said gloomily. "Half of nothing is nothing. You're welcome to it." And he walked away.

Bugs Bunny began to pace energetically. "This ought to be a cinch," he murmured thoughtfully, staring upward, chin in hand. Suddenly his glance focused on the big fruit tree. "I've got it!" he yelled. "Old Doc had the answer right under his nose, sort of, but it took a genius like me to find it for him."

Digging in his pocket for a pencil, Bugs began to print laboriously on the sign pinned to the big tree. "There," he said, stepping back to view his efforts. "Doc's sure lucky to have me as his partner." He peered happily down the street. "What do you know! I think I have a customer."

He did, indeed. First, a few people stopped; then, swarms of people crowded up the steps to Elmer's house. Bugs collected the coins in his hat, grinning smugly.

Elmer, coming down the walk, could hardly believe his eyes. "It's a miwacle!" he cried, clapping his hands. "Come in, evewybody! Welcome to Elmer's gym!"

"It's sure a bargain," one man told him. "All the apples you can eat and a gym lesson for one penny."

Elmer stopped abruptly in his tracks. "Apples?" he whimpered. "P-penny?" He clutched the man by the lapels of his coat. "Say that again, please."

The man backed away fearfully. "Go ask your partner, if you don't believe me."

It was then that Elmer saw the apple tree, now barren of fruit, its empty branches hanging limply to the ground. The sign, pinned to the trunk, had been changed to read ELMER'S GYM 1¢ . . . FREE APPLES FOR ALL!

Bugs waved gayly, a half-eaten apple in one hand. "Aren't I a genius, Doc?" he cried, pointing to the coin-filled hat. "Gotta give 'em something to get 'em in!"

Elmer began to shake. "I'll give YOU something," he screamed, shaking his fist angrily. "You cut my pwices! You took my fwuit! You wobbin' wabbit, I'm wuined!"

"Wait, Doc," Bugs protested. "You'll have to admit that business is jumpin'!"

"I'll make you jump!" Elmer yelled, chasing him down the road. "And it won't even cost you a cent!"
